ABSTRACT

A method for programming a non-volatile memory is described. In the method, a reference level is selected according to the level distribution of the memory cells in a storage state, and then predetermined memory cells are programmed to a next storage state according to the reference level. The reference level falls between the cell level distribution of the storage state and that of the next storage state.